Silence and stillness is where I gain the most insight. Not so much from taking a survey from 10,000 friends when I need to make a decision or wracking this brain. All my answers are underneath the noisy mind and deeper down in my gut and flip through my busy calendar. There is a passage that is pretty powerful from a book called The Power of Silence: "...it's in silence—all thoughts, all wisdom, all perspective. Without it, you'll never see things as they really are, you'll always be ruled by your reactions and, as those reactions prey on your mind and increase in intensity, it'll ruin your peace. "I've always had too many thoughts and questions in my brain with a need to process them and turn every decision into a prism. It's a gift, and it's a curse. To see things from so many different angles. The author of this book, Graham Turner, goes on to say, "when you engage with yourself in real silence, you can find two things. First, how to deal with the events and deal with it. Being able to harmonize all the situations which arise in life is the fruit of deep inner silence. "There was once a silent meditation retreat I attended in Sydney, Australia and it was for seven straight days. I was jumping out of my skin and not the least bit friendly with my thoughts and my feelings. When I realize though that I actually achieved this silence for that length of time, I was so proud. It felt like I could do anything if I could practice the discipline of quiet all day and for days in a row. We weren't able to speak to other attendees or even hear ourselves speak. I met a couple there and they were connected as if there was an invisible bow around them. They shared with me that it comes from having just one day a month where they have one complete day of absolutely no words. They cook, they read, they make love, they sit together in silence with my partner, but it will happen some day because I can have a day of complete and utter silence with myself and get into a zone that fills me up with such love and appreciation for pure and simple quiet. Shhhh.... Susan works at Prevention magazine. She's vegan, and has maintained a big weight loss for over two decades. She is never without her camera, and travels to fun places, often leaving her partner home. In her volunteer life she sings with Threshold Choir, a national network of mostly women who sing softly at the bedsides of the dying, and serves on its Board of Directors. She writes about meditation, health, fitness, love, loss and all things in between the links on this page. Terms of use. If not, maybe you're having trouble thinking of what to write. Fortunately, there's a place on nanowrimo.org that is full of ideas ripe for the stealing. Good morning, National Novel Writing Month participants! Did you do your 1667 words this morning?...Read moreIt's a forum called Adoption Society, so no, it's not actually stealing. People think of plots, and more. You need a free account on the NaNoWriMo website to view the forum, but I recommend it whether you're doing this month's challenge or not. The adoption society is packed with orphan ideas just begging for a home in your next work of fiction. Here are some of my favorites: Adopt a Magical Item - Perhaps one of your characters could drink the Mead of Long Life, which keeps you from dying but only if you toast someone else when you drink it. Or perhaps someone can read (or aspire to write) the Total Perspective Book, which describes the vastness of the universe so perfectly that anyone who reads it becomes utterly incapacitated. Adopt a Ragtag Group of Misfits - Does your novel need a group of couples, all dysfunctional, on an assignment as part of therapy? Or perhaps your office romance occurs in a department of all the people who couldn't be fired, and who are the only ones around when a crisis breaks out. Adopt a Space Filler/Quick Little Moment - One of your characters gets the munchies and takes the rest of the squad on a detour for food. You can describe the food in as much detail as you like. Or your character stops to pet a stray dog. It follows him everywhere. Name the dog. And if you're having trouble naming those characters, misfits, items, or even that cute little dog, stop by the Appellation Station forum, where procrastinating writers are stationed 24/7 doling out monikers. Your answer really summed up how I feel too. I don't think any artist should be restricted to writing their "race" — whatever that means. In my book I write from the first-person of a white Danish immigrant, which I'm not. But I know I wrote that consciousness with a lot of love and empathy and in a sincere attempt to understand. Barbara Kingsolver says that one of the great functions of fiction is that it allows us to empathize with the "theoretical stranger." As writers our job is to bridge those theoretical differences. NB: The "theoretical stranger" — I love that, and I totally agree. So, my writing every day — or at least five days a week. You're right to sense that Queen Sugar has been in the works for a long time; it took me 11 years to write if you count the years between the time I quit my job in 1999 to the month I sold the manuscript in 2011. The story evolved over time. I had the basic premise — a woman leaves Los Angeles and returns was something I discovered over a number of years. I learned a tremendous amount about myself as a writer in the course of writing this book. I learned what kind of writer I am, what I value in a story. I learned to trust my instincts about my writing process -- when to push and when to step away. I learned that as much of a dreamer as I consider myself to be, I can be incredibly stubborn. Maybe stubborn is the wrong word. Maybe determined is a more accurate description. I also learned some painful lessons about the business of writing. Let's just say, I've definitely been tempered by this process. Your story is my story! I quit my job two years before you and it took me 12 years to write and get my book published! So I totally understand how your story must have evolved so much over the years. It takes determination to be a fiction writer — I'm so glad as a reader that you stuck to it! You crafted a great story and a great story and a great story and a great read. I think during my long journey to publishing I had the same kind of determination that was sometimes bordering delusion. After three dozen rejection letters from editors, I was still certain the book should be published. Twelve more rejections later and one yes and I was right. All of that said, how are you approaching the next book? Can you tell what it's about? Do you have the same determination, or hunger or delusion to write it as you did the first book? NB: I have the idea for the next book, but I haven't started writing it yet. My plan is to start working on it, in earnest, this summer. I can't say much about it because there's so much more I want to explore. I'm not finished with Louisiana, and I don't think Louisiana is finished with me. That said, I want to set up new challenges for myself. I read a wonderful quote by Jonathan Franzen a while back. He said:"As a writer, nowadays, you owe it to your readers to set yourself the most difficult challenge that you have some hope of being equal to. And if you do this, and you succeed in producing a reasonably good book, it means that the next time you try to write a book, you're going to have to dig even deeper and reach even farther, or else, again, it won't be worth writing. And what that means, in practice, is that you have to become a different person you already are already wrote the best book you could. There's no way to move forward without changing yourself." I love the spirit of this quote because it gets to the heart of what happens when we write. We're not the same people we are at the beginning. We owe it to our readers and to ourselves, to reset the bar, to set up a new challenge. So, as I think about the next book, the one I have in mind, I imagine it as something different from Queen Sugar. Similar in that it'll be set in Louisiana, but different in subject matter; more challenging in some way, I hope. I find that prospect exciting ... and also terrifying. Will I be as delusional? Probably. I think you have to be delusional, on some level, to write a novel. It's such a long, difficult journey. But even when it was difficult and frustrating; even when I was bitterly discouraged, there was a sweetness to the experience with certain expectations, and by the end, I was much more pragmatic. The business side of being a writer tempered me, and I know I won't approach that process in the same way. But I really think you do it? There has to be magic. If anything, I hope this next novel won't take 12 years. That would be nice. But if it does, it does. I'm not going to fight the process and put something out there that's not ready. That would be the worst. I think that's the only way — to write the story in the time it takes — but yes, don't take another 12 years if possible! So now you've done it: You're a published and "real" writer. Before we sign off, any suggestions to the writers out there still in the hunt?NB: I guess my best piece of advice is, find the people who share your vision. Lots of people will have opinions about your work. Their intentions may be good, but they might steer you in a direction that isn't right for you. It's important to listen to what people have to say, but then learn how to take the advice that works for you and discard the rest. And when you find people who truly understand what you're trying to do, what you're trying to say, who really understand you as a writer, be grateful! Cherish those relationships.
